FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

November 7th, 2009

Introducing an insightful new game to improve our knowledge AND the environment!

EcoMania - the game that grows your knowledge of sustainable living is great fun to play. But you'll likely be surprised at how challenging it is – and what you didn't know about how the choices we all make everyday can impact the one and only planet we call home.

Can something of such magnitude also be funny and engaging? Well, yes. Especially when it is played as a live game show in a group setting, such as a college campus or green living conference. We can learn a lot by watching someone else grapple with key concepts and little-known facts. Choose an area: Composting, Energy, Home & Body, Recycling, Solar, or Water; then choose one of twenty six modules – everything from the mundane (laundry) to the avant-garde (photo voltaics). EcoMania teaches us to reduce our personal footprint, but just as important, we learn to live healthier and save money – lots of money. (You may suddenly realize just how much that old refrigerator is costing you.)

EcoMania was conceived and authored by Julie Hall Allison of Prescott, Arizona. A former multimedia producer and online learning consultant, Ms. Allison has been working with the Phoenix Permaculture Guild, a non-profit organization based in Phoenix, Arizona, to bring EcoMania into being. For a modest cost of $5.95, the game is fully downloadable from the website: www.ecomania-game.com. The package includes over 300 questions (answers, hints and additional info) plus everything else needed to present EcoMania in a public setting or classroom. All proceeds support the Phoenix Permaculture Guild, whose mission is to inspire sustainable living through education, community involvement and creative cooperation.

In conjunction with the Arizona Green Chamber of Commerce, EcoMania will be on display in a special digital format at the Arizona Science Center in the new Green Room Gallery from November 7th, 2009 to January 6th, 2010.
